CENTRAL AMERICAN	MONTHLY	REPORT	‡ 5

Summary

Trends in the region during December were mixed. In Nicaragua, heavy fighting continued in the north, while the Sandinista regime relaxed repression in an effort to relieve foreign pressure and suggest its flexibility in international negotiations. Despite such signals, there has been no apparent reduction in materiel support to the guerrillas in El Salvador, where the insurgents inflicted serious setbacks on the Army. Elsewhere in the area, factionalism continued rife in the Guatemalan military, but the Constituent Assembly election scheduled for mid-1984 is on track; cabinet changes in Honduras reflected the Suazo government's desire to reinvigorate economic policy; the appointment of a new foreign minister in Costa Rica probably helped assuage domestic fears that the Monge government

As Honduras' foreign exchange bind tightens, President Suazo is pressing for a speedup in US aid. For example, Tegucigalpa has requested that all US Economic Support Funds allocated through September 1984 be disbursed by March. While official devaluation of the lempira and other reforms would ease the foreign exchange shortage, Suazo is anxious to defer the heightened inflation, import cuts, and political problems that would accompany these adjustments. Instead of drawing further on its slim reserves, the Central Bank is accumulating payment arrearages, Suazo is pressing for increased US and IMF help, and the government has decided to turn a blind eye temporarily to some black market transactions to ease the import crunch. Thus far, Suazo has not used the emergency economic powers law he pushed through the Congress in November.	25X1

The appointment of Gutierrezone of Volio's closest allies in the cabinetshould reassure Monge's conservative backers that the resignation does not portend a relaxation of San Jose's tough stance toward Managua. Nevertheless, while Gutierrez has been a firm negotiator with the Sandinistas and a worthy stand-in for Volio in the Contadora

	conomic

The administration has proposed additional tax increases and spending cuts in an effort to meet IMF austerity demands, but an agreement with the Fund probably cannot be signed before the end of January. As a result, Costa Rica's rescheduling agreement with its private creditors is likely to be nullified, thereby requiring another round of debt negotiations with commercial Monge almost certainly realizes that his tough tax and spending proposals are likely to provoke stiff legislative opposition. In an effort to transfer responsibility for the austerity measures to the IMF, he has voiced strong complaints about the Fund's demands. His remarks have been sharply criticized by the private sector and the media as counterproductive. Indeed, despite Monge's continuing efforts to enlist congressional support, his criticisms may have contributed to the legislature's failure to repeal a tax in accordance with IMF preconditions for a new agreement.

December meeting in Panama, the Contadora foreign ministers drafted guidelines for implementing the 21 point "Document of Objectives agreed to by the Central Americans last fall.
Although the guidelines did not put forward a multilateral treaty draft or endorse Nicaragua's idea of bilateral treaties, the emphasis on security issues and the vague treatment of democracy and verification issues mirrored Nicaragua's approach. The other Central Americans the "Core Four" were increasingly concerned that the mediators were taking a position that was unacceptable to them and would therefore put the Core our at a disadvantage in the talks.
Most of the Contadora guidelines were accepted by the Central Americans at the 7-8 January joint meeting of foreign ministers in Panama. Nevertheless, the Core Four successfully resisted the Contadora suggestion of declaring an immediate moratorium on the acquisition of arms, a provision which they feared would permanently tilt the military balance against them. The nine nations agreed to form working committees on military, political, and economic issues. The committees will report by 30 April on their progress, including measures to inventory arms and enumerate foreign military advisers.
